Heart Health Awareness Month Part 3:

Submitted by: Beatrice Ramsey

CONGESTED HEART FAILURE : (CHF) is the results of the heart's inability to pump adequate amount of blood throughout the body. This cause a build up of blood in the heart with retention of sodium and the accumulation of excess fluid. The heart helps to pump blood against gravity, when it loses that ability, blood pools in the extremities. This leads to swelling of lower legs, ankles, feet, hands, abdomen and lung congestion.

CHF can be characterized as left – sided or right – sided heart failure. The left sided heart failure is the most common type, because the left side is responsible for getting blood out to all parts of the body, at a great force. If there is a problem in this area, blood can build up in the pulmonary veins causing lung congestion leading to difficult breathing. If left untreated the right side of the heart will begin to fail. This means the side of the heart is not pumping adequate amount of blood to the lungs. However the body is not receiving oxygenated blood effectively.

REMEMBER: There are many heart related illnesses that comes under the umbrella of heart failure. Each illness is different depending on the area of the heart that is affected. Most people with end – stage heart failure have a life expectancy of less than one year. Men and women can be affected by CHF, but men often develop CHF at a younger age than women. Your chance of developing heart failure increases if: you are 65 years old or older. Although CHF is a serious condition that progressively gets worse over time, certain cases can be reversed if treated early in the disease process.
