Understanding Memory Loss - Part 1

Submitted by: Beatrice Ramsey

It is normal to experience some forgetfulness as you age. In fact, memory loss can start to decline earlier than people think. Memory loss in a conversation with others can be embarrassing and aggravating. However, occasional forgetfulness is usually not a cause for concern of early onset dementia. Not everyone has dementia, because of inability to remember a certain situation or event. Children and young adults forgets sometimes. Because their minds are split between two or more situations. Involving in a long amount of desirable time with one situation and forgetting the one they were supposed to do. Of course this happens in all ages. Memory loss is unusual forgetfulness, affecting a person's intellectual ability to think, remember, learn with understand, talk effectively by putting words in correct order and difficult attempts in problem solving.

Some people in their 80's, 90's and beyond defy the common assumption that all older adults intellectual abilities disappear with old age. They are called 'intellectual super agers', with memory performance comparable to people 20 to 30 years younger.
