Generalized Anxiety Disorder

Submitted by: Beatrice Ramsey

If you have the tendency to worry a lot, even when there is no reason, you may have generalized anxiety disorder. This means you are worrying and can't control it. Many people who have generalized anxiety disorder (GAD), don't recognize that they are in a cycle of worry or that their anxiety is worse than the situation. The worse part, the person doesn't know how to stop the cycle of worrying or know it's out of control. Healthcare providers diagnose GAD when your worries happens on most days, lasting for at least six months. GAD is one of the most common mental disorders in the US. Common worries about health, finances, family matters, work or social affairs is something everyone worries about once in a while. But if you are worrying expecting the worst, this can get in the way of living a normal life. GAD can develop when you can't cope well with your internal stress. Sometimes symptoms of GAD can happen as a side effect of medication or from substance abuse. It can also be linked to health illness such as hyperthyroidism – increases hormone production. This can make the body respond more excitable. Some symptoms are: trouble falling and staying asleep, difficult breathing, nausea, frequent urination, problems making decisions and lump in the throat.
