Low Temperatures Increases Virus Transmission

Submitted by: Beatrice Ramsey

Cold weather with low temperatures can increase the likelihood of getting sick. The body is not as effective at fighting a virus when cold air enters the nose and upper airways. Viruses such as the common cold, the flu and COVID - 19 often spread more easily in the winter. Because of this viral invasion, everyone should be very careful to prevent catching a respiratory illness. If being cold can make you sick, it might seem like staying inside is your safest choice. For most people that's not true. Not only are you more likely to pick up germs indoors, but you are also limiting your sun exposure, which you can cause your vitamin D level to drop. Low levels of vitamin D have been linked to influenza A and a weakened immune system, plus a variety of health issues; tiredness / weakness, generalized body aches / pain and even cancer.

Dangers of dry air; dry winter air is great for viruses and not so great for you. Dry winter air allows the flu virus to spread. Air inside your home also tends to be dry in the winter due to heating, This can dry out your nasal passages, making them less effective at fighting off viruses. Keep in mind, less water molecules are available during dry time, increasing the virus projection through the air when expelled through a sneeze or cough.
