ABOUT OUR BONES

We Are Strong and Wonderfully Made

In this article, we will focus our attention on more health-related facts about our Black African inheritances. In most cases, African American have a larger bone size than the Caucasians, according to anthropologist researchers. However, adults of African descent experiences slower rates of bone loss, compared to Caucasian adults. Genetics and environments contribute to higher calcium retention in people of African descent. Bone size also contribute to variations in Bone Mineral Density (BMD). The bone density test is recommended for women aged 65 years and older and men age 70. Because women are more prone to having osteoporosis than men. This is a bone disease that cause weak and brittle bones, from decrease calcium, increasing the risk of fractures. A bone density test will detect any bone health condition that weaken bones, because of our larger bone size the test result will be higher, due to increase calcium in the bones. Remember, our bones give shape and strong structure to our bodies. They support and protect our organs from harm, provides movements and produce red/white blood cells and plasma. According to researchers' calcium, a major mineral is stored in bones with other minerals – magnesium, zinc, copper and phosphate. They help with bone hardness and stability. The femur (thigh bone), humerus (upper arm bone), pelvis (hip bone) and sternum (chest bone) are bones typically larger than Caucasians.

Our deepest condolences to the Cutler, Daniels, and Anfield families at the passing of their loved one, Charles Cutler, who transitioned on 2-11-2026
