The brain is built for accuracy and speed, a complex organ responsible for all the body's daily vital functions. Nothing will be done unless the brain gives the direct orders for daily functional abilities. Visual perception is the brain's ability to react, organize and interpret information from light (what was seen) entering the eyes. Let's get a better understanding of how the brain controls visual perceptions. There is a series of event that takes place before visual appearance. When light (the object we focus on) enters the eye through the pupil, it travels toward the back of the eye to the retina. Visual processing continues, traveling from the eye to the brain using the optic nerve. The impulse from the optic nerve stimulate the occipital lobe, a section of the brain near the back of the skull. It transform all information given by the optic nerve into recognizable images and stores the information for memory. But processing visual affects is not a simple task. Other parts of the brain pitch in to help with visual recognition.

The parietal lobe of the brain, help individuals understand where objects are located in relation to themselves. By creating a mental map of the area, for needed adjustments and movements. Since an image isn't much help without meaning, the occipital lobe sends visual information to the temporal lobe for interpretation. The temporal lobe is responsible for retrieving visual information from stored memory of familiar faces, objects and places. Good To Know: Occipital lobe helps to generate images we see in our dreams.
